From Troubles To Post-Conflict Theatre in Northern Ireland

Published in:
The Oxford Handbook of Modern Irish Theatre

Queen's University Belfast - Research Portal:
Link to publication record in Queen's University Belfast Research Portal

Copyright for the publications made accessible via the Queen's University Belfast Research Portal is retained by the author(s) and / or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing these publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

Take down policy
The Research Portal is Queen's institutional repository that provides access to Queen's research output. Every effort has been made to ensure that content in the Research Portal does not infringe any person’s rights, or applicable UK laws. If you discover content in the Research Portal that you believe breaches copyright or violates any law, please contact openaccess@qub.ac.uk.
There has long been an expectation that playwrights from the North of Ireland must engage with the Troubles. The best of this work has interrogated the causes and consequences of political violence on culture, society, and imagination in the North; however, the sense of obligation to engage with the conflict has inspired and enervated in equal measure. As early as 1972, Frank Ormsby published his ‘Write-an-Ulster-Play Kit’ in The Honest Ulsterman, signalling just how swiftly drama dealing with the conflict had ossified into stock characters and scenarios. It was certainly the case that stock characters, dialogue, and drama in the form of fatalistic tragedies, black comedies, thrillers, and sensationalized spectacle abounded in theatre as much as they did in fiction and film. Narratives of tribal revenge and thwarted romance also proliferated, as the dramaturgy of love-across-the-barricades and melodrama conveniently removed complex causes of political violence to present a murderous Manichaean struggle between good and evil; right and wrong; taigs and prods; ‘two men fighting over a field’—all of which, it could be argued, absolved the state from its responsibility whilst expropriating audiences of their political agency by presenting the ongoing conflict as inevitable and intractable.

While it is possible to identify the tropes that mar three decades of drama from Northern Ireland, and this in turn provides a convenient shorthand to sift through what is a large body of work, as a taxonomic system it can be reductive. Such reductionism is compounded further by the fact that theatre in the North is so frequently siloed into single chapters.

...Northern Irish theatre, Making in the Theatre: Northern Through the Years (ed. Martin Reid, Boyd’s Flats, 1971). Along with Patrick Galvin’s Within Two (1972) and John Haire’s Two (1973), these Troubles plays of the early 1970s are criticized by Lionel Wilson, while Wilson’s John Haire’s Two (1973) and Patrick Galvin’s Within Two (1972) are compared to Ormsby’s ‘Write-an-Ulster-Play’... and unassimilability of sectarian division’. By doing so, Pilkington argues, they absolve ‘the theatre spectator of all responsibility [as] this portrayal of the conflict in terms of an irresolvable social pathology tends to foreclose the possibility of its political solution’. In many plays written by Northern authors, political violence dwells darkly in the wings, malevolently encircling the stage world, sometimes entering and interrupting, but mostly affecting action from offstage. Stewart Parker’s Pentecost (1987), set in the haunted sanctuary of a Belfast house during the civil unrest of the Ulster Workers’ Council strike of 1974, exemplifies this tradition. Indeed, the play might even stand as an appropriate metaphor for Belfast’s theatres, and notably the Lyric, which remained open during the darkest days of the Troubles in spite of the ongoing state of chaos that surrounded it. Given the brutal nature of the Troubles, it is unsurprising that theatre audiences sought some sort of release or relief from the conflict outside; however, it was precisely such middle-class escapism that is attacked in Bill Morrison’s Flying Blind (1977), which satirized those who wilfully sought to ignore the conflict. Set in a single suburban living room, its central character listens to Charlie Parker records on stereo headphones, avoiding what the play calls ‘the old, mindless, useless, sectarian conflict’ that is unseen off-stage.

Christopher Murray also identifies another common motif in Troubles drama: the ‘Romeo & Juliet tropes’. This recurrent narrative of the national romance is a wearyingly familiar form that functions, as Joe Cleary observes, as an emotional, albeit enfeebled, allegorical appeal for political reconciliation. There are legions of examples of this sentimental tradition, from Wilson John Haire’s Bloom of the Diamond Stone (1973), Christina Reid’s Did You Hear the One about the Irishman? (1987), and Graham Reid’s Remembrance (1984). Thomas Kilroy even goes so far as to suggest that one of the classic plays of the Irish dramatic canon, Brian Friel’s Translations (1980), follows this narrative arc, pointing out that the characters Yolland and Maire resemble a Romeo-and-Juliet couple. Although this form has since faded into a clichéd convention, it is one that some playwrights in more recent work have sought to rehabilitate by reconfiguring the transgressive nature of a cross-community relationship so that it instead violates geographical, generational, and sexual boundaries as well as sectarian ones.

Indeed, there was an ambitious attempt to redeem this trope through a logistically complex, site-specific staging of a literal cross-community wedding. The Wedding Community Play (1999) was performed across one of Belfast’s oxymoronically named ‘peace walls’, with audiences transported to terraced homes in both the nationalist enclave of Short Strand and its surrounding Protestant heartland of East Belfast; small audiences were then triaged into even smaller groups to experience an immersive performance in which they eavesdropped on the domestic tensions and sectarian suspicions that suffused the wedding preparations, before being bussed once more to a local church and nightclub for the wedding service and reception. Although community theatre in the North has been criticized

5 Pilkington, Theatre and State, 209.
7 Christopher Murray, Twentieth Century Irish Drama: Mirror up to Nation (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1997), 192.

Barfoot 'Language and Riasvan and Politics in Twe' in Dodin (eds), Friel's History, Myth and Politics in Anglo-Irish Drama', in C. Hoedicke et al. (eds), Politic Performances: Theory and Practice (Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2000), 5-79.

Indeed, for Troubles To Post-Conflict Theatre 375
Antigone's brothers. The Old Man's rough vernacular speech signifies his social position as altogether lower than the aristocratic class and caste of Creon and Antigone, and this freights the play with a class politics that contests the paternalistic precepts of Aristotle's Poetics, whereby only the high-born qualify as tragic. This crucial element leads to an extraordinary confrontation towards the end of the play when the ordinarily servile Old Man suddenly challenges Antigone, as she wallows in her grief, with the no less keenly felt loss of his beloved son, bellowing in her face: 'Yours is not the only grief!'

This is not to say, however, that playwrights prior to 1998 did not challenge the politics of cliché or the traps of convention in their work. Stewart Parker's Northern Star (1984), set in a crumbling cottage on the slopes of Cave Hill in the aftermath of the 1798 Rising, is an Irish history play like no other in that it both contains and critiques the Irish theatrical canon. Stylistically, it ventriloquizes the speech, setting, and style of several Irish playwrights from Sheridan to Beckett, whilst structurally the play is shaped according to the 'Seven Ages of Man', from Shakespeare's As You Like It. The play opens with the first age: that of Innocence (Sheridan), then proceeds to the second age, Idealism (Boucicault), followed by Cleverness (Wilde), Dialectics (Shaw), heroism (Synge), compromise (O'Casey), and knowledge (Behan and Beckett), each written in the distinctive style of the respective playwrights. This metatheatrical structure is integral to the meaning of the play. For example, the opening stage of Innocence aptly labels the naivety of Belfast's urbane intellectual classes who believed that the lofty French ideals of liberté, égalité, fraternité could be transplanted to Ireland where they could transcend territorial and tribal divisions. 'We were city boys. What did we know about two men fighting over a field?' says the play's protagonist, Henry Joy McCracken, at one point. By the Age of Knowledge, however, those sublime principles have been drowned in sectarian slaughter and military massacre. Thus, context and content are thematically connected. The Age of Knowledge plays out in prison and is written in the style of Behan, with explicit references to The Quare Fellow's setting and dialogue. Political history, theatrical tradition, personal biography, and the canon of Irish drama are thus compressed in Northern Star's cat's cradle of politics, historiography, and art.

However, Parker was less interested in the metanarrative of Irish history than in its marginalia. So, in Northern Star, the 1798 Rising is the frame, not the focus, of the play. Likewise, in his 1975 play Spokesong, the Home Rule crises, the First World War, and the Troubles are but backgrounds to what the play claims as the most important date in Irish history—1887—when Belfast-born John Dunlop invented the pneumatic tyre. Likewise, the Ulster Workers' Council strike of 1974 is the offstage context for Pentecost (1987), and the sinking of the Titanic is reduced to a subterranean SFX in his radio play The Iceberg (1975), which focuses instead on the purgatorial plight of two shipyard workers, Danny and Hugh, a Catholic and a Protestant, killed in the construction of Belfast's 'proudest offering to the Empire—and to the world!', whose ghosts wander Titanic's decks on her maiden voyage.

In what is surely the most evocative stage direction in all of Irish drama, Northern Star is set in 'Ireland, the continuous past'. Northern Star and Pentecost are history plays about the future. By the same token, Spokesong's environmental politics, and the character of Frank

---

15 Stewart Parker, The Iceberg, Honest Ulsterman 50 (1975), 33.
16 Parker, Plays: 2, 3.
Monica McWilliams' appeal for fleets of free bicycles to be supplied for the city, offers a precedent for vision that, if met with consistent action, could transform public transport. The Northern Ireland Women's Coalition, founded in the mid-1970s, has been central in the development of alternative political structures. Women have created safe, yet subversive spaces, where they can organize around issues of concern, while agreeing to disagree on the more divisive ones. From the civil rights campaign of the 1960s to the community projects and women's centres of the 1980s, women in Northern Ireland have pushed the boundaries of political possibilities. The Charabanc Theatre Company was very much a theatrical manifestation of this movement.

WOMEN'S TROUBLES

Monica McWilliams, the founder of the Northern Ireland Women's Coalition, draws attention to the vital contribution of women to the public sphere in Northern Ireland:

> Monica McWilliams, 'Struggling for Peace and Justice: Reflections on Women's Activism in Northern Ireland', Journal of Women's History 6, no. 4/7, no. 1 (1995), 32.

---

Charabanc Theatre Company was very much a theatrical manifestation of this movement:

> From the civil rights campaign of the 1960s to the community projects and women's centres of the 1980s, women in Northern Ireland have pushed the boundaries of political possibilities. The Charabanc Theatre Company was very much a theatrical manifestation of this movement.

Monica McWilliams, the founder of the Northern Ireland Women's Coalition, draws attention to the vital contribution of women to the public sphere in Northern Ireland:
Charabanc's work is not only significant for its feminist politics, connecting the personal with the political, and for its collective creation, but also for its decision to perform in community halls and centres across the sectarian divide, in rural and urban venues, North and South, and in working-class areas where live theatre had never been brought before. In pioneering this form of portable theatre, Charabanc set the scene for the later proliferation of community theatre groups.

The work of Charabanc is also significant for its trenchant engagement with class, and in the years since Lay Up Your Ends Northern Ireland’s thriving community theatre sector has consistently engaged with class issues. The same has been true of some established playwrights like Graham Reid, Martin Lynch, and Robin Gledenning, who have all explored how both class and educational systems reproduce sectarian identities, while Marie Jones, Christina Reid, and Anne Devlin have interrogated the complex nexus of class and sectarian politics as it shapes gender roles and relations. Devlin’s Ourselves Alone (1985) invokes the republican movement to accuse it of relegating and restricting women’s agency in real social terms, while simultaneously elevating women as iconic symbols of struggle as Kathleen Ni Houlihan, Mother Ireland, or the grotesquely mutilated character of Aunt Cora, who has been blinded and maimed by a cause for which she's ceremonially, if cynically, wheeled out every Easter. Devlin dramatizes how these gender roles and relations are regulated by domestic violence—a taboo subject also broached by Graham Reid’s poignant Remembrance (1984) and which has belatedly become a critical issue in the politics and theatre of post-conflict Northern Ireland. Indeed, it is possible now to look back to Northern theatre before 1998, and see in some work the prescient traces of concerns that will emerge more forcefully after the Good Friday Agreement, whether racism in Christina Reid’s The Belle of Belfast City (1989), or sexual orientation in plays such Frank McGuinness’s Carthaginians (1988). This work has collectively helped contribute to a new form of civic politics and performance that has been built on in the later work of Colin Bell, Tim Loane, and TheatreofplucK, the North’s only queer theatre company.

PERFORMING THE PEACE

One of the most distinctive, if debilitating, features of the otherwise successful peace process in the North is the fact that there is no state mechanism or apparatus in place to undertake any form of truth recovery, with the resulting vacuum unsatisfactorily filled by a welter of charitable, statutory, and community organizations. This political failure to deal with the past means that artists—particularly theatre artists—have had an enormously important role to play in the ongoing processes of conflict transformation. Even the most cursory inventory reveals a vast repertoire of work produced over the past decade or more. Some have been produced by local theatre companies in Belfast and Derry; some are authored by ex-combatants (Laurence McKeown, Robert Niblock, Brian Campbell, Sam Miller, Danny Morrison, Brenda Murphy), others by professional playwrights (Owen McCafferty, Martin Lynch, Gary Mitchell, Abbie Spallen, Damian Gorman, Tim Loane, Stacey Gregg, Rosemary Jenkinson, Dave Duggan, David Ireland, Marie Jones, Jimmy McAleavey). Yet more work has been commissioned by organizations actively involved in ongoing processes of conflict transformation and transitional justice (e.g. Healing Through Remembering, WAVE, Consultative Domestic and Terror Routledge, in Gonzalez-Perez (2005), 'Engendering UDA: Gary Mitchell's Loyal Tray Faber the and underpinned peace process as well as the new drama, comedies offer a profound shift of the political landscape, as well as the new body still set in the political landscape, are positive signs of the constitution as a whole.

Involvement is the possible emergence of post-conflict drama. For neither beget any parsimony.

The Good Friday Agreement offers a profound sense of post-Agreement. The Good Friday Agreement is a profoundly pessimistic reading of post-Agreement, offering a profound sense of post-Agreement, offering a profound sense of post-Agreement, offering a profound sense of post-Agreement, offering a profound sense of post-Agreement, offering a profound sense of post-Agreement, offering a profound sense of post-Agreement, offering a profound sense of post-Agreement, offering a profound sense of post-Agreement.
orthodoxies it has generated; along with Mitchell, Loane was one of the first playwrights to do so. Their intervention was all the more important given what many see as the mainstream media’s unwillingness, in the interests of maintaining the equilibrium of the peace process, to investigate the causes and consequences of the past four decades of political violence. Indeed, Gary Mitchell claims: ‘BBC Northern Ireland told me I wouldn’t be working with them any more unless I wrote about the peace process and it would have to be positive.’ It is in this context that Mitchell and Loane’s plays are so important. Not only do they set out to ‘rock the boat’ by asking awkward questions, but they also offer difficult, dissident answers—something which imbues their work with an ethical aesthetic integrity. After all, as Stewart Parker observes, ‘the easy answer constitutes an artistic abdication’.

RE-INHABITING THE PAST

‘Plays and ghosts have a lot in common,’ Stewart Parker once wrote. As if in confirmation, several site-specific productions have directly engaged with Belfast’s troubled past, if only to imagine its future, so that the narrative of the play is shared by the place of performance. One stunning example of this was Tinderbox and Field Day’s co-production of Parker’s Northern Star in Rosemary Street Presbyterian Church on the 1998 bicentenary of the United Irishmen’s Rising. The church itself was where Henry Joy McCracken worshipped, as did the Presbyterian founder of the United Irishmen, William Drennan, so the story of Northern Star was ghosted with its history and meaning. When the performance reached the final line of McCracken’s unfinished speech beginning ‘Citizens of Belfast…’, time and space collapsed as an audience was collectively hailed to remember the past and to continue its story.

Likewise, Tinderbox’s Convictions (2000) ghosted the site-specific setting of the dilapidated Crumlin Road Courthouse, the impact of which derived largely from the auraic experience of the place. Featuring seven short playlets, each named for an area in the building, written by different authors and performed in different spaces, Convictions transported small audiences to view these scenes in different sequences. For instance, Owen McCafferty’s Courtroom No. 1 hauntingly used the court as a purgatorial setting for a dialogue between a nameless victim of the Troubles and the disembodied voice of his unseen interrogator. The victim seeks answers in the vain hope of finding some form of closure or resolution to his plight; however, his hope for release or redemption is continually denied. Similarly, Daragh Carville’s contribution was set in the Male Toilets of its title, where a jaded photographer and PR man meet whilst above them the former courthouse is being launched as a tourist information centre and heritage site. Lamenting the days when Northern Ireland ‘had an identity … a brand’, the photographer goes on to wonder:

PHOTOGRAPHER. What if there were a way we could keep Northern Ireland in the public mind. Internationally, I mean? […] Just the odd wee bomb … Think of the * Parker, Plays: 2, xiii.

---

Publicity...just like the old days...pull us back on the map. Make Belfast—a boom.

Carville's jaunty joke is itself an embryonic example of a kind of Ulster osthel, to borrow a term that emerged in the former East Germany: a sentimental belief in the 'good old bad old days' that has informed and inflected later work, such as Beano Niblock's Reasons to Believe (2009) and, arguably, Martin Lynch's hugely successful History of the Troubles (Accordin' to my Da) (2002) and Chronicles of Long Kesh (2006), which replaced the Troubles as a long series of comic set pieces. Lynch's West Belfast winter takes this a step further, as he explores the Troubles can happen at any time, even in comical circumstances. Some commentators regard such comic, carnivalesque treatments as a re-finding to Belfast's institutional and everyday environment, and use them to highlight the Troubles as a long series of comic set pieces. Lynch's West Belfast winter takes this a step further, as he explores the Troubles can happen at any time, even in comical circumstances.
Whilst all the above plays represent very different responses to the legacy of the 'Trouble', most of them do not have the potential to play far beyond the North given the specificity of their humour, topicality, and subject matter. This is certainly not the case for the work of Owen McCafferty, McCafferty’s importance as a post conflict playwright lies in the fact that he writes about those who played no part in the conflict, the ordinary people living in extraordinary circumstances. This approach is what distinguishes Scenes from the Big Picture (2003) as one of the finest plays written by an Irish playwright in the past twenty years. Joycean in its ambition and vision, Scenes presents a prismatic perspective of an entire city in a single day as a collage of short scenes lit, flux, and fade to produce the eponymous 'big picture' of contemporary life in a modern city. Although setting the play in Belfast, McCafferty deliberately decontextualizes the city, decoupling it from the overdetermined images of conflict that have served only to caricature the place. Certain incidents do elliptically invoke the recent past: an inherited allotment yields a secret cache of buried weapons and a drug dealer is kneecapped, but this is the historical backwash of the 'Troubles'; it does not shape the narrative, for McCafferty seeks to stage a much more complex picture of a city emerging out of conflict.

Set in a rural border backwater and comprising monologues by three characters, Abbi Spallen’s Pumpgirl (2006) seems to have little in common with Scenes, but its portrait offers a fascinating counterpart to the other's big picture. The play is set in the hinterland of rumour and ragwort of south Armagh, on the Northern side of the border and in the midst of republican fielddom of fuel smugglers that have left Pumpgirl’s petrol station 'on it last legs'—on the wrong side of a fluctuating exchange rate. This is a landscape change utterly by demilitarization as road blocks, border bases, and military watchtowers have been removed in what were the most striking materializations of the peace process. And yet, even though the topography of South Armagh is so deeply inscribed by the politics of conflict, Pumpgirl never directly references the Troubles because the Troubles are over. In era no longer governs everyone’s lives, even though its legacy inscribes the very language and landscape of the play. The character of Hammy describes racing his motor cars 'up b the new hotel that got bombed in '94', whilst the secluded scenic spot where Pumpgirl meet him for their trysts is where 'two Prods were took and killed about fifteen years ago’. The elliptical presence of the past has an unsettling effect, instilling a haunting sense of how history, landscape, language, and memory have been misshaped by acts of political violence that have reinscribed the border areas with an altogether new form of diminuendo.

Bearing Witness

It has been observed that 'the end of conflict is not the end of violence for women'. Pumpgirl’s story is beguilingly told in the voice of a young tomboy, whose decency and innocence makes her brutal gang rape all the more horrific. It also opens up a traumatic
The Northern theatre has begun to bring into the light, notably the way in which the sexual and physical abuse of women was completely silenced throughout the Troubles. In this, the North is not unique. Many countries emerging out of conflict are confronted with the reality of epidemic levels of violence against women, masked by more public forms of violence. As Mary K. Meyer notes, 'during the 1996—7 IRA ceasefire, reported incidents of domestic violence increased by 40%.'

The renewed ability to see sexual violence in a post-conflict society is developed powerfully in the Theatre of Witness project, I Once Knew a Girl (2010). Based in Derry, Theatre of Witness is run by Teya Sepinuck, who, through a series of workshops with non-actors, composes scripts based on the lived experiences ofshore, workshops, and interviews that the cast revise, edit, approve and perform. These performances resemble a form of verbatim or documentary theatre, but one in which the performances are produced by the same individuals who perform the role. The performances are not derived from reports or documentary evidence, but from the lived experience expressed by the same individuals who perform the role.

In this, the North is not unique. Many countries emerging out of conflict are confronted with the reality of epidemic levels of violence against women, masked by more public forms of violence. As Mary K. Meyer notes, 'during the 1996—7 IRA ceasefire, reported incidents of domestic violence increased by 40%.'

The renewed ability to see sexual violence in a post-conflict society is developed powerfully in the Theatre of Witness project, I Once Knew a Girl (2010). Based in Derry, Theatre of Witness is run by Teya Sepinuck, who, through a series of workshops with non-actors, composes scripts based on the lived experiences expressed by the same individuals who perform the role. The performances resemble a form of verbatim or documentary theatre, but one in which the performances are produced by the same individuals who perform the role. The performances are not derived from reports or documentary evidence, but from the lived experience expressed by the same individuals who perform the role.

In this, the North is not unique. Many countries emerging out of conflict are confronted with the reality of epidemic levels of violence against women, masked by more public forms of violence. As Mary K. Meyer notes, 'during the 1996—7 IRA ceasefire, reported incidents of domestic violence increased by 40%.'
through its ability to manifest through performance what was hidden, in this case a shared experience of sexual and physical violence that crossed political and sectarian divides. Both the policewoman, Maria, and the IRA volunteer, Anne, had been exploited and abused by male figures of authority; moreover, each equally assumed that their suffering did not matter in the context of the ‘real’ violent struggle convulsing their respective communities. ‘I’ve been raped more than once,’ says Maria. ‘I never told anyone ’cause compared to all the violence during the Troubles, I thought it was insignificant. But it wasn’t. It’s happened to too many of us.’ And from the opposite side of the conflict, Anne tells a similar story. Collectively, these testimonies also reveal how patriarchal organizations like the police and the IRA, operating in militarized masculinist culture of secrecy, institutionally reproduced sexual violence and colluded in the oppression of women, who now must struggle ‘to make public the private violence they experience’.

Like an earlier Theatre of Witness play, We Carried Your Secrets (2009), developed by victims and perpetrators of political violence, I Once Knew a Girl was followed by facilitated discussions between performers and audiences, which in itself ‘generated an extensive archive of reflective responses from many of those who saw it.’ A comparison might be drawn here with the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission, of which Catherine Cole claimed that its efficacy as a spectacle came from the fact that ‘its public enactment was also about people speaking and being heard.’ This is where the importance of the Theatre of Witness lies: its post-show discussions, generated by the performance, provided a public forum for civic debate. The ‘actors’ in these performances—individuals whose politics, memories, and identities were often violently opposed—also participated in the post-show discussions, just as they had shared stage space with one another. As a cast, their camaraderie and deep affection for one another was palpable, even though they remained deeply divided by their political convictions. For many, this in itself seemed indicative of the potential of theatre as a site for peace and reconciliation.

---

Peace and Reconciliation

If Troubles drama has been largely defined by the expectation that artists deal with the conflict, perhaps post-conflict theatre in the North can be similarly defined by an expectation that it should play some sort of role in the processes of truth and reconciliation. David Ireland’s Everything Between Us (2010), like David Park’s novel The Truth Commissioner, envisages how a notional Truth and Reconciliation Commission would pan out, with its

---

34 Teya Sepinuck, ‘I Once Knew a Girl’, directed by Teya Sepinuck (Derry: The Playhouse, 2010), unpublished script, 15. [The editors wish to thank Teya Sepinuck for providing us with the unpublished script to this play.]
FROM TROUBLES TO POST-CONFLICT THEATRE

In Quietly, McCafferty reminds us of the redeemable possibilities of truth, and that where he has argued elsewhere to meet the social and political needs of the peace process, McCafferty asks the question "What's the point?". The point is not to seek for truth and reconciliation; rather, it is to create a space in which the truth can be told, and one in which the truth can be heard. The point is not to seek for a confessional truth, but to create a space in which the truth can be told and heard, and in which the truth can be confronted and held accountable.

In Quietly, McCafferty presents a vision of truth as a process of reconciliation, rather than as a seeking for recrimination. The play is set in a divided society, in which the past is not forgotten, but is acknowledged and confronted. The play explores the idea of truth as a process of healing, rather than as a seeking for punishment or revenge. The play is set in a divided society, in which the past is not forgotten, but is acknowledged and confronted. The play explores the idea of truth as a process of healing, rather than as a seeking for punishment or revenge.

In Quietly, McCafferty presents a vision of truth as a process of reconciliation, rather than as a seeking for recrimination. The play is set in a divided society, in which the past is not forgotten, but is acknowledged and confronted. The play explores the idea of truth as a process of healing, rather than as a seeking for punishment or revenge. The play is set in a divided society, in which the past is not forgotten, but is acknowledged and confronted. The play explores the idea of truth as a process of healing, rather than as a seeking for punishment or revenge.
At the start of the play, Jimmy cannot bring himself to listen to Ian’s account of his actions on that fateful day, constantly interrupting and correcting him, seeking to coerce his narrative into one that shores up his own:

JIMMY. just say what happened—simple enough isn’t it—the facts are the truth—

 isn’t that why you’re here to tell the truth and be reconciled

IAN. no—and there’s more to the truth than facts.40

Ian’s retort that the facts alone are not sufficient are not the weasel words of someone trying to excuse his actions, nor are they an attempt to evade his responsibility; it is simply the view that truth is perspectival and positional. In the closing scene, Ian offers Jimmy his hand in a gesture which Jimmy eventually accepts, though with the admonition: ‘don’t ever come back here again.’ It is a gesture freighted with symbolism, as formal handshakes between public figures on opposite sides of the conflict have become markers of historical change. In _Quietly_, McCafferty has suggested that ‘there is no huge gesture about it, it is a male way [...] of ending something. It’s finished.’41 It is an uneasy, unsettling act. Both men have reached an understanding, and there is a reconciliation of sorts, but no expectation that they will meet one another again.

After _Quietly_ opened in Dublin’s Peacock Theatre in 2013, McCafferty recalled being emotionally upset afterwards by its impact, belatedly realizing that, in many ways, he had written _Quietly_ about his generation, about ‘the Belfast we grew up in and how it affected us’.42 As such, it seems the last in a cycle of plays (_Mojo-Mickybo_, 1998, _Closing Time_, 2002, _Scenes from the Big Picture_) that deal with Troubles and their aftermath; and though there may never be any clean break, this seems a sensibility that is shared in the work of a younger generation of writers like David Ireland, Rosemary Jenkinson, Lisa Magee, and Lucy Caldwell, Stacey Gregg, and Abbie Spallen.

Continuity and Change

One striking new motif that can be traced through a wealth of new plays over the past decade has been the theme of change, specifically the transformation of Belfast. A slew of plays feature the returned émigré, usually someone who fled Belfast during the Troubles but who has now returned home to find a city they barely recognize. In the Kabosh Theatre Company’s site-specific _Two Roads West_ (2009), an audience of four share a black taxi tour with a returned local who is re-familiarizing herself with a city in which she feels a stranger. Likewise, in McCafferty’s _The Absence of Women_ (2010), two down-and-out navvies in a dead-end dosshouse discuss coming home to the city they have heard has been transformed. In Graham Reid’s _Love Billy_ (2013), the eponymous hero (first made famous by Kenneth Branagh in the _Billy_ television plays in 1982–4), is utterly discombobulated as he wanders around his old stomping ground, unable to find anything familiar from the old days.

---

40 Ibid., 35.
41 Ibid., 51.
42 Owen McCafferty in conversation with the author, 8 May 2014.
Looking after an elderly father who refuses to accept or to acknowledge his child’s play takes the form of a monologue about a middle-aged transgendered woman. Forging a way through the memories the decision to stage Tragedy at Teesport at Tees of evangelizing the city in the name of the more resonant. The centre behind promoted as the Catholic Quarter, the Mac, which opened in 2012, seems to merit a significant moment in Northern drama. After this exchange, the Troubles are not mentioned again. In his underplayed way, this TRIESTE. The Troubles! I’m so sick of talking about it and hearing about it.

MARTHA. What is it?

TRIESTE. It’s just so fucking boring.

MARTHA. What’s it?

TRIESTE. Yeah, can we stop talking about it now?

(she shuffles her feet in embarrassment and looks at him for an answer)

MARTHA. No. I don’t feel I don’t understand it. I don’t understand how.

TRIESTE. You seem so normal—and you and your family, and all the other people I meet

MARTHA. The Troubles. How we let them happen. Like why it went on. And why it TRIESTE. I don’t understand it. I don’t understand how it could have happened.

Troubles with a combination of ignorance, horror and curiosity.

and though she’s paddled frenetically to discuss the issue. Martha seems to take about the been killed in a mortar attack on the Catholic Quarter, her mother was pregnant with him.

learn about her new daughter. And with Martha discovering steve’s polycarbonate father had inexplicable relationship with an otherwise perfect Martha. She is a Catholic Prolific explanation of his decision, his stance on the Northern ends and on the more social restless mood. She is a character who, / she has been / the Catholic Prolific in the Tragedy at Teesport (1993), Ireland’s play offers a novel take on the old-actors-theater

Two shows running simultaneously at the recently built Teesport and Mac Theatre-Post-politics remain as entwined as ever. It equally true that the North is changing, and these-

While no one would dispute that many of the features of Northern Ireland’s confessionnal transformation, pointedly using her birthname, 'Paul', whilst scorning her appearance and identity. Tuesdays was performed in the MAC's ground floor exhibition space, its rear wall of which is wholly made of glass facing onto the busy passageway that leads in the new piazza style courtyard at the front of the building, surrounded on all sides by fashionable restaurants and bars. Peter Quigley played Pauline from the street outside whilst the small audience watched from within the theatre into which sound was broadcast, so that the solid glass wall constituted a transparent yet complex staging, leaving Quigley to negotiate his dr: performance among the civilians' passing through, many of whom reacted with amusement, curiosity, or fright. All of this inflected Pauline's narrative of having to endure the heteronormative society which reacts to and rejects her appearance and identity, where her own father maligns her even as she carries out her kindly ministrations. Pauline bears all with good grace, but an encounter while carrying out the most mundane task—shopping at Tesco's with her father upsets her, and in an emotional outburst, performs right up against the glass wall, Pauline poignantly pleads for tolerance. I am a woman and I go with my father on Tuesdays to Tesco's [...]. [M]y name is Pauline. [...] It's all quite normal.¹

In post-conflict Northern Ireland, far too much emphasis remains on the politics of orange and green, rather than the grey areas in between or the positions of the LGBT community, women, and immigrants, all of whom get short shrift. Since the signing of the Good Friday Agreement, the North's peace process has placed enormous political capital on ensuring the 'normalization' of politics, culture, and society, as signalling a successful post-conflict evolution from war to peace. A byword for demilitarization, decommissioning, and the stability of democratic structures, alongside the massive inward investment and regeneration of the North's economy, 'normalization', as Theatreofpluck reminds us, is a heteronormative process that is an inadequate metric of political progress. If Can Forget About You suggests we should learn to stop talking about the past, Theatreofpluck suggests some of the things that we should learn to begin discussing.